Artist and MacArthur Fellow, Tom Joyce, forges multi-ton industrial remnants and byproducts of large scale manufacturing into artworks that direct one's attention toward iron's micro & macro function in the universe - from its silent meander through the bloodstream of oxygen breathing life forms, to its performative role at Earth's core where dynamic movement creates the entire geo-magnetic field that keeps the planet tethered in orbit around the sun.

About the projet

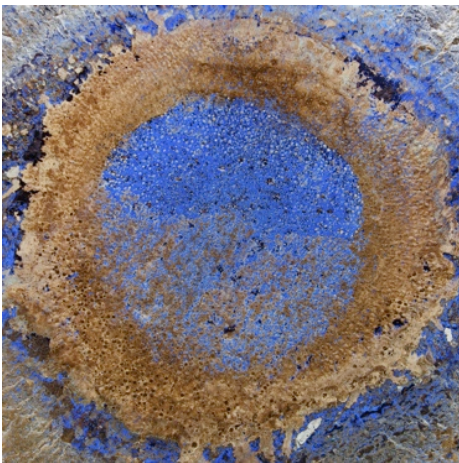

This photographic series investigates microstructures inherent in iron, the raw material I use to forge sculpture. A distinct dendritic pattern, as unique as a human fingerprint, develops when molten iron slowly cools inside massive ingot molds during the first phase of its manufacture. The strength of the material is determined at the moment of its birth and, in essence, it's "genetic code" is reflected in the re-crystallization recorded in these images of iron and steel ingots colored by impurities that rise and settle on its surface.
